pamphlets under the doorsteps of people in this section."

Johnson told an audience at Monticello that White's injection of the Negro issue into the campaign was "an admission that we can't handle the Negro problem."

Mississippians, Johnson said, did not want "some narrow-minded fellow who will stir up race trouble in Mississippi."

In an address at Marks, White asked the voters to weigh his past record of public service against the promises made by Johnson.

"I don't want the governorship if it means I have to make promises to the people of Mississippi that I know I couldn't keep," the former governor said.

White said Johnson's program for schools, welfare and highways would require many millions of dollars more than the state now receives in revenues.

"You know who will pay those dollars," White continued. The only way the state can get more money is to raise taxes, put on more taxes or float bond issues and every bond issue means more taxes."

As the campaign neers its close Johnson is spreading all kinds of propaganda, White charges.

"His father (Former Gov. Paul Johnson) succeeded me to the governorship and he had more in-he will speak at Kosciusko, Eupora, Calhoun City and Oxford, and winds up his campaign Monday at Bay St. Louis, Pascagoula and Gulfport.

Johnson was scheduled to speak today at a large picnic and rally at Ruleville. Sen. James Eastland (D-Miss.) a Johnson backer, will be a guest.
